

Educate

Here's an otherwise undisclosed topic we should look at. It's the educators and the systems we put our kids and young people through. I got called out at a recent Christmas party when speaking with my old boss and some other good friends. We both had kids in college and I made a tipsy comment about 'these foreign professors liberalizing our kids according to their personal agendas'. My point was that this is hardly the Great Generation and so many of our academics are preaching old "Marxist garbage" and a self-endearing liberal agenda, like a bad case of Stockholm's. That was 2016, so I guess I would have been the smartest one in the room if I had said "leftist professors", given the rash of far left professors (and lawless judges) who have come into the spotlight.

I guess we all see the changes in our kids as they make it through middle school and hopefully on to a four year degree. My favorite (aside from middle school trauma) was when my beautiful kid came home from college one time and questioned her belief in God. To which I say, "well you may not believe in God, but you better damn well believe in the devil". That's all that was needed in this case and I am comfortable that both theories are still acknowledged.

Here is the point, the kids grow up a little and we lose some insight into their curriculum. Of course, that is a problem but there is not much we can do, since it's part of growing up. However, we need to have some assurances and standards, this is basically what we buy into in a private school system. Public schools are wide open for every kind of ideology and this is the problem we are currently facing. This is not our father's generation and we have got some real bloomers working within the public school system, not just the teachers but more importantly within chain of command.

There is a department of education but apparently, any public school system can be hijacked by the local school boards to control the curriculum, as they see fit. We are talking about "control and indoctrination"; race, gender, religion, history and parts of the curriculum are all up for grabs. If these local schools maintain acceptable standards they are free to solicit and promote any ideologically spin they choose. Children and adults are far too easily misled to leave our public schools open to the highest bidder. This is happening now, and I see school board meetings where the members have that same "blank stare" on their faces that the local town hall members do when residents complain bitterly about locally imposed ordinances such as agenda 21 protocols, (or return to the feudal state).

So, the minor leagues seem to be the new battle front for social devolution and we need to start looking past the talking points at the local board meetings and college orientations. There is no excuse for this within the 1-12th grade public school system, where we need a zero tolerance for anything but a solid public education. I'm talking about reading, writing, arithmetic and job skills, and not ideological pandering. Colleges should also have a neutral base to act as solid platform for higher education and we should all call out the universities and the professors for undue influence.
